Where drainage has been most complete and the soil has been most perfectly aerated, there is a tendency toward the destruction of organic matter in the loose, incoherent surface soil and a resultant tendency toward the lighter gray or nearly white color. In the lower lying areas, where there is a greater amount of moisture and where complete decomposition of organic matter is not the general rule, the colors become gradually darker with increasing humidity in the surface soil, until a brown, somewhat loamy covering is formed at the surface of the soil, showing its gradation toward other swampy and lower lying types. The subsoil to a depth of 36 inches or more is typically a medium to somewhat coarse, incoherent yellow sand. In small areas where the Norfolk sand occurs in connection with other types the deeper subsoil is often modified in color from the usual pale yellow to orange, red, or even mottled yellow and red. Such variations in the color frequently occur where the Norfolk sand is found in small patches and in close association with types of the other series. They usually mark a thin development of the Norfolk sand associated with soils of the Orangeburg or Sassafras series. Even in localities where the Norfolk sand is typically developed to a considerable extent it is not unusual to find near the margins of each of the areas of this type locations where borings at the greater depths show sandy...
