But for this the wise men who formed our Government dared not have hoped for its perpetuity; for they saw floating down the tide of time, wreck after wreck, marking the short life of every Republic which had preceded them. With this, however, to check, to restrain, and to direct their posterity, they might reasonably hope the Government they founded should last forever; that it would secure the great purposes for which it was ordained and established; that it would be the shield of their posterity equally in every part of the-country, and equally in all time to come. It was this which mainly distinguished the formation of our Government from those confederacies or republics which had preceded it; and this is the best foundation for our hope of a perpetuity-to the peace, power, and prosperity our Union has conferred. The resolutions which have been read, and which I had the honor to present to the Senate are little more than the announcement of what I hold to be the clearly expressed declarations of the Constitution itself. To that fixed standard it is sought, at this time, when we are drifting far from the initial...
